DPS Joins the World of Social Media

Editorial: DPS and the Social Media Experience

Shortly after being appointed Director of the Public Information Office in July 2014, I received numerous calls and emails inquiring, “When are we going to finally get on social media?” “When are we going to get into the 21st century?” I am proud to say that we have made it.

It was not an easy road. Like most people, I thought it would be as simple as getting someone with a little social media “know how” to set up an account and start posting. As I began to do my research, I realized that the work I thought we were just beginning had actually already begun before I arrived.

You see, the decision to utilize social media, was not made lightly or impulsively. There was a small group of advocates from the Public Information Office, Human Resources, and Recruiting who had already put together some research on social media policy and best practices. They planted the seed. I just happened to be here when Colonel McDonough made the decision to delve into the world of posts, likes, shares and tweets.

In the next few days, you will see a new social media policy, as well as changes to establish policies concerning internet usage and social media. Please ALWAYS, ALWAYS, ALWAYS be cognizant of the intense power of social media. The Department faces a couple of primary challenges where social media is concerned: finding the appropriate tone when communicating on social media channels; educating the Department on why the official use of social media is important to the overall communications and outreach strategies; and protecting its officers and civilian employees from the physical environment, as well as virtual space, by making online safety paramount.

We understand that this is a prime opportunity to inform, engage, and empower the citizens that we serve, as well as a way to provide timely communication to a vast audience without the filter of traditional media. However, if it does not support our mission statement, you will not see it on social media.

Currently, we have a presence on Facebook, Twitter, YouTube, Google+, and Instagram. We have plans in the future to branch out into other social media platforms. Feel free to enjoy the content being posted and to Post, Share, Tweet, and Like the good news about the Department of Public Safety. Always remember what goes into cyberspace, stays in cyberspace.
